Material Worlds, Culture, and Consumption: Anthropological Reflections on the Koine Concept

This paper offers some reflections on the Material Koine concept from the perspective of recent developments in Anthropology, especially the anthropology of material culture and consumption. Specifically, it discusses current understandings of the nature and significance of culture and the ways that culture both structures and is constructed by consumption. It further examines the range of processes by which material worlds are constructed and inhabited, emphasizing particularly the significance of social fields (in Bourdieu's sense). It also examines the attractions and dangers of applying linguistic concepts, such as the koine, to material culture and discusses methodological implications for archaeologists studying ancient Greeks.
